

Jahangir's Quadrangle and Khwabgah-i-Jahangiri

جہانگیر کا صحن اور خوابگاہ

1. Basic Facts

- Built by: Emperor Jahangir
- Built in: 1618 CE onward
- Cost: Not documented in available sources
- Built for: A residential quadrangle including the emperor's sleeping quarters (Khwabgah) and the Diwan-i-Aam

2. Construction Details

- Contents: The Diwan-i-Aam, the Khwabgah (Jahangir's sleeping quarters, now housing a small museum of Mughal antiquities), the Kharak Singh Haveli (a later Sikh-era addition), and the Sehdari pavilion
- Materials/technique: Not separately itemised in available sources
- Craftsmen involved: Not documented

3. Historical Background

- The Khwabgah today houses a small museum displaying Mughal-era antiquities, giving visitors a rare direct look at objects from the period rather than only the architecture itself.
- The quadrangle is closely associated with the popular legend of a "chain of justice" that Jahangir is said to have hung outside the fort, so that any wronged subject who could not get justice through ordinary channels could pull it directly to summon the emperor's personal attention.

4. Interesting Facts / Trivia

- The chain-of-justice story is one of the most repeated anecdotes about Jahangir's reputed personal commitment to fairness as a ruler - though it should be treated as a celebrated court tradition rather than something independently archaeologically verified.

5. Scenario / Narrative Moment

Somewhere below these apartments, tradition says, hung a chain that any ordinary subject of the empire could pull - no official, no bribe, no waiting room, just a rope leading straight to the emperor's own ear. Whether or not it happened exactly as the story goes, the fact that Lahore still tells it, four centuries on, says something about what people wanted to believe was possible from the throne above them.
