

Royal Kitchens (Shahi Bawarchi Khana)

شاہی باورچی خانہ

1. Basic Facts

- Built by: Not documented in available sources
- Built in: Not documented; located near the Alamgiri Gate
- Cost: Not documented
- Built for: Preparing food for the imperial household and court

2. Construction Details

- Materials/technique: Not documented in available sources
- Location: Near the Alamgiri Gate

3. Historical Background

- Underwent conservation by the Walled City of Lahore Authority (WCLA), with reporting around 2018 indicating the space was being prepared for public opening after restoration - meaning this is one of the more recently reopened, less traditionally documented parts of the fort.

4. Interesting Facts / Trivia

- Unlike the fort's palaces and mosques, the Royal Kitchens represent the fort's working, functional side - the infrastructure that kept the court fed, rather than a space built for ceremony or display.

5. Scenario / Narrative Moment

Behind the grandeur of marble halls and mirrored ceilings, an entirely different kind of Mughal craftsmanship once operated here daily - feeding an empire's court - largely undocumented for centuries until conservationists in the 2010s decided this overlooked working space deserved its own restoration, too.
