1. Basic Facts

- Built by: Not individually documented; a Sikh-period addition
- Built in: Sikh period
- Cost: Not documented
- Built for: Reportedly used as an office for Faqir Syed Noor-ud-Din, a trusted governor under Ranjit Singh

2. Construction Details

- Location: East of the Bari Khwabgah
- Materials/technique: Not documented in available sources

3. Historical Background

- Its use as an administrative office for one of Ranjit Singh's most trusted governors illustrates how the Sikh court repurposed spaces within the fort for day-to-day governance, not just ceremony.

4. Interesting Facts / Trivia

- Like the Athdara, its name ("seh" = three, "dari" = doored) describes its architecture directly - a small but functional addition to the fort's growing Sikh-era administrative footprint.

5. Scenario / Narrative Moment

A modest three-doored room, easy to walk past today, was once the desk from which one of Ranjit Singh's most trusted officials helped run the day-to-day business of an empire.
